

Allie Cleary

Allie Cleary has nearly two decades of experience in Florida government, politics, and public policy. Throughout her career, Allie has developed a reputation for navigating complex issues, building consensus among legislators and stakeholders, and translating policy objectives into effective legislative strategies.

During nearly 14 years in the Florida Senate, Allie advised four Senate Presidents and held key leadership roles, most recently serving eight years as Senior Health Care Policy Advisor to the Senate President. In that role, she advised Senate leadership on priority health and human services issues, including health care regulation, Medicaid, substance abuse and mental health, services for individuals with disabilities, health care workforce initiatives, and child welfare reform. Allie worked closely with legislators, state agencies, executive leadership, and stakeholders to develop and advance major policy and funding initiatives.

Allie's experience in Florida politics and government began in the private sector, where she worked for three years with former Senate President Bill Galvano before joining his legislative staff in 2012. She later managed a political campaign during the 2014 election cycle and served as an analyst in the Senate Majority Office, covering a broad range of policy areas. These roles provide Allie with a deep understanding of how policy, politics, and government intersect, allowing her to approach client priorities with substantive expertise and strategic insight into Florida's political landscape.

Allie lives in Tallahassee with her husband, Kevin, and their two children, Madison and Liam.
